Language is a means of communication, exchange of ideas, and information transmission between people, and it plays an important role not only in everyday life, but also in culture, science, art, and many other areas. Currently, the development of the Uzbek language is slowing down, and the need for another language is increasing. However, in modern times, the development and preservation of the Uzbek language is facing a number of problems. There are various regional dialects in the Uzbek language, and the differences between them make it difficult to form a formal form.

Today, the demand for foreign languages is increasing. Especially now, with the development of the Internet, the demand for learning foreign languages in society is growing from year to year. This can greatly harm the study of the Uzbek language and its development. Currently, the Uzbek language has a high place in society. The Uzbek language is the state language of Uzbekistan, and its place in society is very important. The Uzbek language serves as the main tool in the culture of the people, education, science and communication. At the same time, the development and preservation of the language plays an important role in the social, economic and political life of Uzbekistan. Also, the development of the Uzbek language serves to improve the image of Uzbekistan in the international arena. After all, establishing mutual relations with other languages, in particular with Russian and English, in a multilingual environment strengthens intercultural dialogue. The Uzbek language forms national traditions and preserves the cultural heritage of the state. However, since Uzbekistan has a multinational society, it is necessary to maintain a balance between different languages and cultures.

The development of the Uzbek language has an impact on interethnic relations. By adopting and adapting other cultures and languages to the language, it strengthens interethnic harmony. The Uzbek language plays an important role in international relations and economic cooperation. By studying and developing the language, Uzbekistan makes itself known on a global scale and facilitates mutual understanding with representatives of other nationalities. It is also worth noting that due to the high need to learn other languages today, young people of Uzbekistan can easily communicate with guests from abroad. Therefore, there is less need for visitors from abroad to learn our language. If we develop the Uzbek language, this, in turn, will serve to ensure stability and harmony within the country. The development of the Uzbek language is of great importance in all aspects of society, in particular, in education, culture and economy.

In general, languages actively participate in all spheres of society and remain an integral part of its development. Behbudiy, indicating the factors that lead to language learning, emphasizes that Turkic and Persian are "a great blessing" for the local people, since they are both native languages, and that every Turkestan, even "without education", knows these languages well.

If we look at the sphere of language communication, the importance of communication in the development of the Uzbek language is extremely great. Communication ensures communication between people, expresses thoughts and feelings. In this regard, it can be said that communication helps to preserve and develop cultural heritage and traditions. It expresses culture through folk wisdom, songs and poems. Each language comes with its own culture, customs and social rules. In particular, the communication of languages is important for shaping the social life, culture and development of people. Interethnic communication is often carried out using a common language, for example, English. However, communication is also possible through different languages, which requires interlingual understanding. Each nation has its own culture, traditions and values. In the process of communication, it is important to understand and respect these differences. The effectiveness of communication depends on the mutual understanding and acceptance of two or more parties.

Interethnic communication is relevant in the process of globalization, as it strengthens ties between different cultures and helps solve problems. In the modern world, languages are developing, while some are disappearing. The reason for this is only human and social ties. In order to preserve these languages, linguists and representatives of other fields are preventing languages from disappearing.

The 90s of the 20th century became a golden link in the chain of our history. The age-old dream of our people came true. The Soviet Empire was rotting from within, and from the mid-80s, a sense of national pride and self-awareness began to grow in our intelligentsia. The problems of restoring national traditions, national culture, and strengthening the prestige of the national language began to arise. Later, on October 21, 1989, its official proclamation as the State Language of the Republic of Uzbekistan was a great historical event for that time. The adoption of the Law "On the State Language" put an end to the fact that our language was squeezed under the influence of the Russian language and remained a second language used only on the street and in the family. The current Uzbek literary language is a polished, processed, and molded form of the national language.

Speaking of foreign languages, learning a foreign language has developed to this day. A foreign language is a language other than one's native language, usually associated with other countries and cultures. Learning and understanding a foreign language is important in modern society. These languages are taught as a core subject in many educational institutions. Knowing a foreign language increases career opportunities, as many companies operate in the international market. Learning other languages helps to understand other cultures, traditions and customs. At the same time, it is often emphasized that we should not forget our own national language. According to UNESCO, there are currently more than 5,600 languages in the world. The level of development of these languages, their role in society, and the number of speakers vary.

After Uzbekistan gained independence, the Uzbek language was recognized as an official language, which opened a wide path for its development. The Uzbek language is taught in educational institutions, scientific research is conducted, which is of great importance for the development of the language and its transmission to the younger generation. Uzbek culture and literature are becoming internationally recognized. The use of the Uzbek language is increasing. Uzbekistan is increasing the opportunity to promote the Uzbek language and culture on a global scale through international conferences, cultural and language festivals. The globalization of the Uzbek language is helping to strengthen not only the language itself, but also Uzbekistan's position in the global arena. Learning and using foreign languages expands interethnic communication. Global languages, such as English, occupy a central place in many communications. The globalization of interethnic communication increases understanding between different cultures and peoples, contributing to the development of a global society.

Sociology is the study of society, social relations, groups, institutions, and their interactions. Sociology analyzes social structures, rules, and processes, and also helps to understand how people interact in groups and what social influences they experience. If we talk about interethnic sociology, it is a field that studies the relations between different ethnic groups and cultures, and its importance in society is great. This field plays an important role in reducing misunderstandings between different cultures and nations, strengthening social integration, and maintaining peace. It deepens mutual understanding of different nations and cultures, helps them accept each other. This is especially important in multinational and multicultural societies. Sociology makes recommendations aimed at preventing social conflicts that arise in interethnic relations. By analyzing the causes of ethnic conflicts, it shows ways to resolve them. As our great ancestor Alisher Navoi noted, “A human being becomes more intelligent than an animal with language, and a human being becomes more intelligent with time”.
